Martin first put up at a little country inn at the village of Drummondsville, three miles above Niagara, and out of the ordinary lines of travel.

There he has been living ever since, at least, until a very few days ago. He secluded himself as much as possible from observation, and was known by the name of Shoebridge.

It was his custom to walk over to the Clifton Hotel at Niagara Falls nearly every day to read the New York papers and return in the evening. Sometimes he would catch a ride over, but he never remained at the Clifton for any length of time, except on one occasion, when he took a meal there and registered as K.
